FROM THE DESK OF THE Chief Executive Officer

For the past 20 years, our management company, OMG, has been honored to serve NARPM® and its members. Looking ahead, you'll see exciting new services emerge from the organization. This fall. NARPM® will embark on a newly designed strategic plan, setting new goals aimed at advancing the industry and better serving our members.

Who Is Behind the NARPM® Staff?

I wanted to start my article by thanking each of you for the support you have given me over 20 years. NARPM® is strong because of you, the Members! As you heard from NARPM® President Amy Hanson, with changes that are happening around the industry, and to align with 2.0, NARPM® needs a CEO who will be in place for the long-term.

With my future of wanting to retire in a few years, it was decided to begin the transition in 2025.

Are you familiar with the NARPM® team that operates similarly to your own company? We're a management firm, Organization Management Group, or OMG (www.managegroup.com). However, instead of managing doors and properties, we manage trade associations and professional societies. Our company has a robust and experienced team that is equipped to handle all of NARPM®'s needs.

We are proud to be a charter-accredited association management company, recognized through our industry's AMC Institute. Many of our staff also hold specialized designations, just like many of you. With deep knowledge of the real estate sector, we were chosen to support NARPM® because we truly understand the challenges and opportunities in property management and sales—especially as they relate to current legislative developments.

We even have a specialized LLC division, Legislative Services Group, dedicated to managing NARPM®'s legislative efforts. Our management team is passionate about the support they give our clients.

For the past 20 years, our management company, OMG, has been honored to serve NARPM® and its Members. Looking ahead, you'll see exciting new services emerge from the organization. This fall, NARPM® will embark on a newly designed strategic plan, setting new goals aimed at advancing the industry and better serving our members.

OMG is proud to be a long-standing partner of NARPM®, and I personally have been involved from the very beginning of this partnership. Over the years, I've built incredible friendships with many of you — relationships I truly cherish. Please know that I will always be here to support you and the NARPM® community.

As we approach the second half of 2025, our team is working closely with NARPM® volunteers to successfully close out the current strategic plan. The NARPM® 2.0 Strategic Planning Task Force is developing bold new goals, and the Leadership Development Committee is currently interviewing candidates for the 2026 Board of Directors. This year, we've seen more applicants than ever before — it's an exciting time for the organization!

If you've ever considered getting more involved, now is the time. Whether it's joining a committee or serving on the Board, the opportunity to contribute is one you won't regret.

Thank you for the opportunity to serve you and this incredible organization. To those I've connected with via email or met at conferences, I appreciate you and all you do to keep this industry relevant.

I hope you're enjoying a fantastic summer, and I look forward to seeing you in October at the National Convention in Orlando, Florida!

Warm regards,

Gail 👜

Can anyone direct me to a source for maintenance standards for less common maintenance needs such as tree trimming, pest activity on the property but not in the house, dryer vent cleaning, etc.? I have a challenging tenant who demands services every time something comes up that they deem a concern to health and safety. When the hot water heater failed, it was an easy decision to replace the unit as well as the expired smoke detector. However, some of the requests go far. For example, two branches fell from trees in the backyard over the course of a year, and that resulted in a demand for tree trimming service. There was no obvious sign of impaired trees. A rodent, which may have been a rat, was seen in bush at a distance from the house and resulted in a demand for ongoing pest service. (They admitted there is no evidence of activity in the house). It would be easy to schedule these services to maintain the peace, but these requests extend beyond my examples and add up to a lot of cost for the owner. The house is well maintained overall.

I checked the state and municipality's guidance on tree care and didn't find any clear standards. For this particular issue, we wound up with three bids for tree maintenance and they varied greatly in scope and what was identified as the greatest needs. The work was completed. So, just wondering if anyone can share standards that you've cultivated over the years that are effective regarding tree maintenance and exterior pests that are not impacting the building. And do you have the dryer vent cleaned out every year? Do you adjust the frequency of this service based on the number of occupants?

I own rentals as well as manage for others and have for a tick over 40 years now. In my experience, it is simply not worth the time, effort or energy in pacifying a resident who is too demanding of trivial items as you described. Over the years, I have offered to allow them out of the lease early, no fee or adverse action (explained "because it seems we haven't been able to satisfy you" or similar verbiage), but they have to give me a definite answer no later than 14 days from today and/or non-renew them at the end of their lease term.

We simply can't devote an inordinate amount of time for a resident that has become "demanding," to use your words. Letting go of those rare tenants who seemingly just can't be satisfied frees you and your team up to getting a better tenant that is appreciative of you, your team, the owner, the opportunity to rent from you and, in just about every way imaginable, everyone's life becomes better

With AB2801 Phase 1 already in effect and Phase 2 coming July 1, I'm curious to get some insights on what property management companies based in California are doing to make sure they comply? Is this a big concern at the moment or are you prepared?

I have been doing move-in and move-out pictures for several years. I use zInspector, which gives great reports. I'm now asking vendors to do job-completion pictures for me to comply with the security deposit detail.

We've seen from the insurance side of things that normal pictures don't do well in litigation. Too much can be changed. Have you seen any solutions that burn the timestamp and GPS location on the image?

Inspection express has 360 date- and time stamped-images that make your case bulletproof, especially with the side-by-side move-in vs. move-out 360 walk-through inspection.

We are looking at setting up stages in our reports for pre and post maintenance to be added to the move out inspection. That way it's all documented.

Remember – everything you read on the Internet is not true. If necessary, seek legal counsel.

Rebuilding trust after a rate increase: retention strategies that work

No one enjoys telling their clients that prices are going up. But in property management, it's often unavoidable.

Between inflation, increased labor costs, regulatory changes and rising expectations from both residents and property owners, we reached a point where a rate adjustment was not only justified, but it was also essential for maintaining the quality of our services.

Like many small, service-oriented property management companies, our margins had tightened, our technology was costing more, and internal labor costs had increased significantly. After holding off for as long as possible, we made the difficult decision to implement a rate increase for our clients starting January 1, 2025.

We also made several operational changes, including shifting the cost of our resident benefit absorb rising costs without compromising service quality — but had reached a threshold where sustainability required action. We shared data on cost increases, shifts in vendor pricing, and new regulatory burdens. This helped our clients see the increase as thoughtful, measured and tied to realworld challenges.

MAKE THE VALUE VISIBLE

We paired every increase with a reminder of what clients receive in return. From same-day response times to in-house maintenance coordination, proactive vacancy prevention strategies, and compliance oversight, we made sure to connect our fee with tangible outcomes.

For example, our Resident Benefit Package had traditionally been paid by residents. However, to reduce disputes, improve consistency, and protect package (RBP) from residents to owners and updating insurance compliance requirements.

Here's how we navigated the transition, retained our trust-based relationships, and learned a few things about clear, honest client communication along the way.

LEAD WITH TRANSPARENCY

We didn't bury the increases. Our message to clients, sent in November 2024, opened with a tone of appreciation and acknowledgment — thanking them for their continued trust while recognizing the changing landscape of the rental market. From there, we clearly outlined what was changing, why it was necessary, and how we would continue delivering

Instead of focusing solely on the increase, we emphasized how our team had worked hard to owners from unexpected tenant challenges, we moved this fee to the owner side. We didn't just announce this shift; we explained the "why." The package reduces tenant churn, increases lease compliance, and provides owners with better longterm outcomes. That made it easier for clients to understand how the change actually supported their goals, even though it was technically a new cost.

ANTICIPATE RESISTANCE AND ADDRESS IT RESPECTFULLY

We knew not every client would be happy. We acknowledged this directly and empathetically. Instead of dodging the issue, we included language like: "We understand that changes in cost are never welcome news, and we want to be clear and transparent about what is changing, and why."

By validating concerns upfront and inviting follow-up questions, we maintained trust, even with clients who were initially frustrated. A few chose to leave, but many responded positively to the tone and detail of our message.

We sent updated management agreements via DocuSign, including clear instructions and a firm deadline for review. For clients who didn't respond, we followed up with a phone call to bring the changes to their attention and answer any questions. These conversations often made the difference, especially with those who were on the fence. This approach struck a balance between clarity, automation and professionalism while minimizing friction for clients who were ready to move forward.

We also remained available for one-on-one conversations. For those with questions or concerns, we took the time to walk through the updates personally. These discussions didn't just resolve objections; they helped build stronger, more trusting relationships.

KNOW YOUR VALUE, AND THEN OWN IT

Raising prices can feel uncomfortable, especially if you're in the business of service. But we learned that when you clearly communicate your value, back it up with consistency, and stay available to answer questions, the right clients will stay.

More importantly, we came out of this process with stronger documentation, a clearer onboarding process, and renewed confidence in our offering. We didn't just raise prices; we refined our positioning, improved internal processes and strengthened our relationships.

THE RESULTS: FEWER DOORS, STRONGER BUSINESS

We were fully prepared to lose some business, and we did about 4.5% of our doors. However, our net income increased by nearly 20% after the adjustment. In other words, we became a leaner, more profitable and more focused company by serving the right clients under the right terms.

FINAL THOUGHTS

If you're considering a rate increase, don't wait until you're stretched thin or underwater. Proactive communication, honesty, and a strong service foundation can carry you through. Clients don't leave because of cost—they leave because of confusion, surprise, or perceived lack of value.

Lead with clarity. Deliver with integrity. And don't be afraid to charge what you're worth. 👜

The rise of AX: Is SEO dead or just evolving?

There's a shift happening in search — and if you blink, you might miss it.

You've heard of UX (User Experience). Now meet AX: Agent Experience, the emerging standard for how content is being discovered, processed and delivered by Al-powered search agents like Google's new Search Generative Experience (SGE), OpenAl's ChatGPT and Perplexity.

These aren't your traditional search engines. They don't just list links. They synthesize. They summarize. They solve.

So, what does this mean for property management companies who rely on website traffic and local search engine optimization (SEO) to generate leads?

Let's dive into the rise of AX, why it matters, and how we are preparing for the next evolution of search.

WHAT IS AX (AGENT EXPERIENCE)?

AX stands for Agent Experience, and it refers to how Al-powered user agents (think ChatGPT, Google SGE, Perplexity, Claude, etc.) consume, understand, and retrieve your content in response to user queries.

Instead of a search engine user typing "property management company in Palm Springs" and seeing 10 links, they now get a single synthesized answer, often pulled from multiple sources, including (hopefully) your website.

That user agent becomes the middleman between your business and your future customer.

To be considered in these results, your site must be structured, technically sound and informationally useful. And the content must be written in a way that helps the agent understand your business, location, services and differentiators without relying on a user clicking your link to find them.

WHAT'S CHANGING: GOOGLE'S NEW SEARCH AGENT LAYOUT

Google is already rolling this out. In Search Labs, Google's SGE replaces traditional blue links with a smart answer box generated by Al. It provides a detailed summary, followed by follow-up questions - and only later down the page do you see traditional organic results.

This is the start of the zero-click era. Users don't visit websites to get answers; they stay on the Al platform.

KEY FEATURES OF GOOGLE'S NEW LAYOUT:

- Al-generated summaries with citations (sometimes);
- Conversational follow-ups like "Who is the best property manager in my area?"; and,
- · Fewer link clicks, more answers directly on the page.

IS SEO DEAD?

Not quite. But traditional SEO as we know it is evolving fast. Keyword stuffing and chasing high-volume, low-competition terms won't cut it anymore. The future of search isn't about ranking higher in the link list; it's about being included in the

This means technical SEO, schema markup, structured content, internal linking, and authoritative expertise are now the must-haves. And content must do more than attract a click. It must answer the question clearly, directly, and contextually.

WHY THIS MATTERS FOR PROPERTY MANAGEMENT COMPANIES

Most property management companies rely on their websites to generate owner leads. But if traffic drops due to zero-click answers, what happens?

Here's what it means:

- Your website still matters, but the way it's built and structured matters more.
- Your content needs to solve problems, not just sell services.
- Local SEO will shift toward local authority building, not just citations and keywords.
- FAQs, reviews, schema and structured data will determine if you're "seen" by user agents.

This is why we are doubling down—we're not just building beautiful websites anymore. We're building front-end experiences for users and back-end frameworks for AI agents.

AX TIMELINE: WHEN WILL AI AGENTS TAKE OVER SEARCH?

Let's be clear: The takeover has already started:

- 2023: ChatGPT launches with browsing capabilities, becoming a top entry point for casual searchers.
- 2024: Google launches SGE in beta; Perplexity AI rises in popularity.
- 2025: Over 25% of U.S. search traffic is influenced by Al summaries or zero-click answers, especially in local and service-based industries.
- 2026 and beyond: Al agents are expected to handle 40-50% of information queries, becoming a new layer between your site and the end user

If you're not already building for AX, you're playing catch-up.

HOW MUCH SEARCH ARE LARGE LANGUAGE MODELS (LLMS) PULLING AWAY FROM GOOGLE?

According to recent studies:

- ChatGPT is responsible for over 10 million search queries per
- Perplexity and Claude see growing user bases, especially among tech-savvy professionals.
- Google's SGE interface is impacting as much as 40% of its search results in experimental rollouts.

In local verticals like property management, the shift is already visible: less traffic, but more intent-driven conversions — if you're showing up where it counts.

Let's clear up one myth: AX doesn't replace websites; it changes how they're read.

A strong AX-ready site should:

- Present clean, well-organized answers.
- Offer trust signals like reviews, local offices, licenses, and service details.
- Use structured data so the agent can understand your site as a whole.
- Still look great and convert leads when a user visits your site.

Think of AX as the invisible SEO layer between your website and the future of search.

WHAT PROPERTY MANAGEMENT COMPANIES SHOULD DO NOW

- 1. Audit your site for schema, speed, clarity and crawlability.
- 2. Stop chasing just volume keywords. Focus on intent, clarity and local expertise.
- 3. Update your FAQ pages, reviews and testimonials; these are gold for AX.
- 4. Create content that answers questions clearly and directly.
- 5. Partner with a company building for both UX and AX.

FINAL THOUGHTS: ADAPT OR GET REPLACED

Search is changing. The days of being on "page 1" are fading. The new question is: Will your business be part of the answer? Your next customer might not click a link; they might just ask an Al. Make sure the answer includes you.

Buying a residential property management business: due diligence checklist

There are countless benefits to buying an existing residential property management business, including better financing options, established tenants and reduced start-up time. However, the success of the acquisition greatly depends on a comprehensive analysis of the business, also known as due

For buyers, the due diligence process verifies you are buying what you think you're buying, ensures a fair price, uncovers issues early, and increases the likelihood of a successful acquisition. Because it's a complex and intensive process, it's ideal to have your lender, attorney and accountant support you through this process.

TRANSPARENCY

Be cautious if a seller or broker limits your access to key employees after you have received a commitment for financing. While it's unlikely a buyer will receive unlimited access to the seller's team, your team's ability to go in and ask questions of all senior management before closing allows you to conduct quality due diligence.

Both parties need to determine a mutually agreed upon time to meet with key employees early enough to adjust the deal structure if the borrower's team identifies significant risk in the discussions. This allows you to assess the true financial health, tenant relationships and operational efficiency of the residential property management business.

DEPENDENCIES

During due diligence, it's vital to be aware of potential dependencies. Dependencies can exist from the seller, key employees, vendors or even tenant concentrations. For example, a potential reliance is for the property management business's success to be tied directly to the property managers.

People don't have infinite lives, and companies can live longer than their founders. Therefore, owners must consider transition strategies to maximize a company's value and ensure scalability.

The buyer should unearth how the seller runs the residential property management business and understand the tenants' and homeowners' existing relationship with the company. Additionally, make sure you have a clear understanding as to why the owner is selling. Ask the right questions to confirm that you aren't inheriting unsatisfied tenants and property owners.

To assess the health of a residential property management business, looking at key performance indicators related to its properties and tenants is very beneficial. Start by looking into the occupancy rates for the last three years for the properties under the seller's management. These rates should be high or increasing, demonstrating competitive pricing, great marketing, and positive customer experiences. Tenant renewals are reflected in low turnover rates. This further reinforces this property management business's stability. If turnover is high, it's time to investigate these issues. Are the prices competitive for the area? Are there unresolved maintenance issues?

OWNER RETENTION

A crucial aspect of due diligence when buying a residential property management business is evaluating portfolio diversity. A good-standing property management business avoids over-reliance on a specific property owner. This can create a huge risk if a large owner withdraws their properties. Looking for a diverse portfolio can help reduce risk and increase greater stability.

CYCLICALITY

How susceptible is the residential property management business to an economic downturn? One way to gauge is to ask for financial statements from 2007 to 2010 to see what impact the last recession had. Can the property management business survive a similar decline in revenues and profits from the current run rate once the acquisition debt is on it?

It's important to analyze some key metrics such as occupancy rates, rent collection, and maintenance requests during that period. If the business does not have records from that time, investigate the typical cycles of the tenant base.

REVENUES PULLED FORWARD

Sellers may be tempted to sell very hard just before a sale, especially if they keep the A/R as part of the purchase agreement. They can offer tenants discounts or other renting incentives and sign leases before closing. If they do, the buyer may experience a revenue "trough" right after closing. Usually, a business recovers from it, but it makes the first few months of ownership stressful. To prevent this, ask for a monthly report each month before closing. If you see a spike in revenue, dig in and understand why.

COASTING TO THE FINISH LINE

The company feels a similar impact to the revenues pulled forward if the seller loses focus on maintaining and acquiring tenants in the period leading up to the sale. The buyer can experience a revenue "trough" due to the lack of leasing inquiries. To monitor this, ask for the historical pipeline of the residential property management business. Ensure you don't see a sharp decline in the months leading up to the sale.

VERIFICATION OF REVENUES

To verify revenues, at minimum, the buyer's CPA can conduct a reconciliation of the business deposits over the past year (from copies of the bank statements) to the reported cash revenues for that same period. This is one of the most common complaints heard about early problem loans.

EMPLOYEES

What has the seller's role been with the property management business? If the seller has been passive, they can be replaced. However, the transition becomes vital if they hold key relationships or specific essential knowledge of the business. Consider a contingent seller note to ensure their continued interest during a transition period if they are important to the business. For example, there might be special licenses required to do business. On a side note, explore why they are selling. If the seller is still relatively young and is leaving to pursue "other interests," beware.

MARGINS AND CASH FLOW

Most businesses trade on a multiple of earnings before interest, taxes, depreciation and amortization, referred to as EBITDA. In most cases, the reported EBITDA is "adjusted" by the seller to reflect "normalized" operations. Therefore, a vital piece of due diligence is verifying any adjustments.

ADDBACKS

Many adjustments to the reported EBITDA are valid addbacks. However, to be valid, they must be quantifiable and verifiable. For example, the seller's salary (assuming they are leaving the company) is a valid addback. It can be quantified and verified through the company's tax return, payroll journal or W-2.

TREND ANALYSIS

Seek to understand significant changes in margins. Beware of situations where the margins significantly improved in the most recent period. If the reasons aren't well-defined and verified, consider basing the valuation on the average margin over the past few years. Remember, in cash basis accounting, not paying your bills can lead to higher reported profits. Make sure you examine the businesses' accounts payable to guard against this.

EOUIPMENT

Do a physical inspection of all equipment. Is it in working order? Is a clear equipment list included in the purchase agreement?

WORKING CAPITAL

In almost all cases, the seller retains all cash in the business and pays all funded debt of the business. In a stock purchase transaction, the working capital should be set at a normalized level. A "target level" is sometimes set, and the difference in working capital at closing can lead to a slight increase or decrease in the purchase price. Typically, the seller should not retain the A/R in a stock transaction. In an asset purchase, the A/R may or may not be retained by the seller. If the seller retains A/R, this will effectively increase the overall purchase price since you will need cash to fill this initial hole in the balance sheet after closing. Make sure you factor this in when agreeing upon a purchase price. This is an area where a seller may attempt to get more than their company is worth by tacking on A/R.

Once the due diligence phase concludes, you should have a clear understanding of whether this residential property management business is a good investment or one that you should walk away from. It's a critical component of the acquisition process and allows you to fully understand your target business. While you may never find a "perfect" deal, due diligence allows you to identify any risks and properly mitigate those risks before buying. Due diligence can help you negotiate the purchase agreement and set yourself up for a smooth ownership transition process.

To assess the health of a residential property management business. looking at key performance indicators related to its properties and tenants is very beneficial. Start by looking into the occupancy rates for the last three years for the properties under the seller's management.

Northwest Regional Conference & Vendor Fair was a total success! The Northwest Regional Conference & Vendor Fair, helpful staff and overall flow of the conference, which was held May 12-14 in downtown Portland, Oregon, proved to be a very successful event for our Northwest Region of property management professionals. Organized by the Portland Chapter and supported by the Washington State NARPM® Chapters, this conference seamlessly blended education, networking and community engagement.

INSPIRING SPEAKERS AND EDUCATIONAL EXCELLENCE

The conference featured a lineup of distinguished speakers who addressed the evolving challenges and opportunities in property management.

A standout session was led by Greg Bell, renowned author and motivational speaker, captivated attendees with his insights on team dynamics and leadership. His presentation, rooted in his bestselling book, "What's Going Well?", resonated with many and focused a positive light on the hard job of being in the property management industry.

In addition to keynote addresses, the conference offered a diverse range of breakout sessions covering topics such as risk management, tenant relations and operational efficiency. These sessions provided attendees with practical tools and strategies to navigate the complexities of property management in today's dynamic market with key takeaways, especially for beefing up technology and creating system efficiencies.

CULINARY DELIGHTS AND SEAMLESS ORGANIZATION

Beyond the educational content, the conference venue provided a great culinary experience. Each meal was thoughtfully chosen, offering delicious options for all.

The event's organization was impeccable. From the smooth registration process to the timely transitions between sessions, every detail was meticulously planned. Attendees appreciated the clear signage, which allowed them to maximize their learning and networking opportunities.

NETWORKING AND COMMUNITY ENGAGEMENT

A highlight of the conference was the Vendor Fair, which facilitated meaningful interactions among property managers and vendors. This forum not only showcased the latest products and services but also fostered discussions on best practices and emerging trends in property management.

PORTLAND: THE PERFECT BACKDROP

Portland's vibrant atmosphere added an extra layer of appeal to the conference. Attendees had the opportunity to explore the city's renowned food scene, eclectic neighborhoods, and scenic parks during their downtime. The Hilton Duniway's central location made it convenient for participants to immerse themselves in the local culture, enhancing the overall experience.

LOOKING AHEAD

The success of the 2025 Northwest Regional Conference & Vendor Fair has set a high bar for future industry events. The conference exceeded expectations. As the property management landscape continues to evolve, gatherings like this play a crucial role in equipping professionals with the knowledge and connections needed to thrive. It is the regional goal to move forward with a Northwest Regional Conference every year.

For those who missed this year's event, the 2026 conference promises to build upon this success, offering even more opportunities for learning, networking and community engagement. Stay tuned for announcements and prepare to be part of another exceptional experience!

CHAPTER Spotlight

GET TO KNOW THE EXCELLENT NARPM® CHAPTERS ACROSS THE UNITED STATES

Lacy Hendricks, RMP®,

is Broker and Director of Marketing for Hendricks Property Management, which she joined in 2014. Lacy serves as a NARPM® PAC Trustee, President of the San Antonio Chapter of NARPM®, and is the immediate past chair of the NARPM® National Governmental Affairs Committee. In 2024, she won Property Manager of the Year from the San Antonio Board of Realtors (SABOR), Volunteer of the Year Award from NARPM® in 2023, and in 2018 won the first ever Legislative Champion Award from SABOR.

San Antonio brings the energy and community

San Antonio's rental market is shifting, and SAMAC — the San Antonio Metropolitan Area Chapter of NARPM® — continues to develop with strong leadership, relevant education and real community impact. Since 1995, SAMAC has grown into a trusted resource for property managers who are hands-on, informed, and dedicated to doing the job right.

EDUCATION THAT HITS THE MARK

2025 kicked off with a packed January meeting featuring Vendoroo's Pablo Gonzalez, who spoke on the power of word-of-mouth marketing. In March, Wolfgang Croskey led a dynamic session titled "Why Al Needs Policy, Not Just Hype," complete with accountability planning and lively discussion. Both meetings drew a full house and left attendees with fresh, practical takeaways.

SAMAC's education calendar stays focused on what Members actually need. In May, we offered the EPA Lead Paint Certification Class, a must-have for anyone managing older homes. Then, in August, we're hosting Shawn Johnson's virtual class "Real Estate Investing for the Property Manager." He'll walk through the basics of investing, creative finance strategies, and how to help owner clients who are feeling the pinch from high taxes, stagnant rates, and rising costs. It's the kind of info every property manager should be ready to discuss with clients right now.

INVOLVED AT EVERY LEVEL: WHY IS SAN ANTONIO SO SUCCESSFUL?

We've been told our Chapter is a lot different than others. Our meetings have energy, engagement, and real community. That culture has helped us build something strong and it shows.

We've also been told that our Chapter can accomplish advocacy wins that aren't seen in other areas. But why? Our Members show up, volunteer, serve and invest. We've worked hard to build our network across the industries, and now, we have a real voice in the conversations that matter.

SAMAC is an RPAC major investor and regularly sponsors San Antonio Board of Realtors (SABOR) events, often giving tickets to Chapter Members so more people can get involved. Currently, SAMAC has two Members on SABOR's Board of Directors, including one on the Executive Committee. We also have three members on the Governmental Affairs Committee and three who teach as state-licensed instructors at the Board.

Thanks to this relationship, SAMAC is now considered an Ally Organization and no longer pays Affiliate dues.

SAMAC members also sit on the city's Zoning Commission, the Renter Solutions Subcommittee and have contributed to local housing and transit policy.

Most recently, we were invited to join the Rental Engagement & Assistance to Connect with Housing (REACH) Steering Committee. This city-led effort brought together representatives from NARPM®, SABOR, HUD, the Apartment Association, local housing authorities, the Housing Trust, Close to Home and other key agencies. The group created 10 recommendations for City Council aimed at improving voucher programs and removing barriers to housing.

The work on REACH was years in the making. It took nearly a decade to get all the right voices in the same room. And while the recommendations are important, the real win is in the relationships we built. SAMAC now has direct contacts across every agency involved in local housing policy. That access is powerful, and it positions property managers as essential partners in local housing solutions.

IT ALL COMES BACK TO RELATIONSHIPS

Everything SAMAC does — from education to advocacy to community events — is rooted in building relationships. Property managers are a vital part of San Antonio's housing landscape, and we work every day to make sure that role is understood

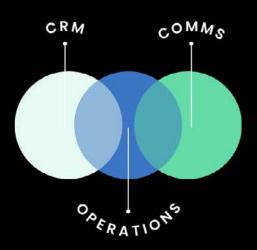

It takes time. It takes consistency. But the payoff is real, and it's why SAMAC continues to be one of the most engaged and effective Chapters.

Consistent, Reliable Communication is an Investment in Operational Freedom

The owner received a letter from the city government citing serious code violations, threatening penalties including potential jail time, and demanding compliance within two days. When he frantically called his property manager, the owner discovered something even more disturbing: The company had received this notice five weeks earlier but hadn't gotten around to mentioning it to him.

Communication from the firm had been poor, but this was the final straw. The owner, a major client, took his business elsewhere.

This nightmare scenario — based on a very real case — represents the ultimate communication failure in property management. While extreme, it highlights a fundamental truth. In this industry, trust isn't built through occasional brilliance but through unfailing reliability, especially regarding critical information that affects an owner's legal and financial standing.

with the information promised, a fundamental shift occurs. Owners stop wondering what they're not being told. Their mental vigilance relaxes, and they can focus on other priorities rather than monitoring their property manager.

Consider our opening scenario. When the property manager failed to immediately communicate a code violation notice, they violated the most basic expectation: that critical information affecting the owner's legal standing will be shared immediately. The owner wasn't just angry about the violation. They were devastated by the realization that they couldn't trust their manager with even the most fundamental responsibility.

THE COMMUNICATION CONTRACT

The foundation of trust-building communication is establishing clear expectations during onboarding. Establish a "communication contract" and specify

This July, as we reflect on independence, it's worth examining how a manager's operational freedom — which comes through trust — is earned through communication consistency that makes such catastrophic failures impossible.

This July, as we reflect on independence, it's worth examining how a manager's operational freedom — which comes through trust — is earned through communication consistency that makes such catastrophic failures impossible.

THE PSYCHOLOGY OF PREDICTABILITY

Property owners entrust managers with their significant investments, often representing years of savings and future financial security. This creates an inherent anxiety that manifests differently in each owner. Some respond with constant check-ins and micromanagement, while others appear hands-off but harbor silent worries.

The antidote to this anxiety isn't occasional excellence but absolute predictability. When communication arrives exactly when expected, exactly what information the owner will receive, when they will receive it, how it will be delivered, and what actions may be required from them.

Exhausting, right? Well, no, not really. Not all information carries equal urgency. A critical part of your communication contract must include clearly defined tiers of information with corresponding response times. Emergency information requiring immediate owner notification might include legal notices with penalties, structural emergencies, events with liability implications, or criminal activity. Urgent matters needing attention within a day or two include significant maintenance issues, important tenant notices, or insurance claims. Standard information can be included in regular scheduled updates — things like routine maintenance, market updates, or financial performance within expected parameters.

The communication contract doesn't mean nonstop updates. It's about promising absolute reliability in whatever schedule you establish. An owner who knows they'll receive a comprehensive update every first Tuesday of the month feels more secure than one who receives sporadic communication.

THE CONSISTENCY SYSTEM

Every property in your portfolio should have a communication rhythm. To achieve this consistency, you need standardized templates for each communication type, calendar triggers that prompt preparation well before deadlines, quality control checkpoints to ensure completeness, team accountability for meeting communication deadlines, and backup procedures for when primary communicators are unavailable.

The goal is making communication so systematic that it becomes impossible to miss a scheduled update or fail to notify an owner about critical information.

WHEN SYSTEMS FAIL: ANATOMY OF A COMMUNICATION CATASTROPHE

Let's dissect the code violation catastrophe to understand how multiple communication failures compounded. First, there was a failure to prioritize critical information. The property manager didn't distinguish between routine matters and those carrying legal consequences. They lacked a system that automatically escalated government notices to immediate-action status.

Second, there was no accountability system. Without tracking processes for critical communications, this notice likely sat in someone's inbox for nearly a month. Effective property management requires accountability workflows that track every significant communication from receipt to resolution.

Third, there was no redundancy in critical communications. The manager may have relied on a single point of contact who failed to act. Professional operations need backup systems. If the primary person doesn't respond, the system should escalate to ensure Fourth, there was an absence of damage control protocol. When they finally communicated the notice, they clearly lacked a crisis management approach. A proper response might have included immediate acceptance of responsibility, a detailed plan to resolve the issue, commitment to cover resulting penalties, and documentation of new preventative processes.

Finally, there was no learning system. This catastrophic failure wasn't the first warning sign. There were other communication failures that preceded it. Without a system for tracking and learning from minor communication breakdowns, the stage was set for an eventual major breach of trust.

The lesson is clear: communication failures rarely happen in isolation. They typically represent systemic issues that escalate over time until a catastrophic breach of trust occurs.

EXCEEDING EXPECTATIONS STRATEGICALLY

While consistency forms the foundation of trust, occasionally exceeding expectations strengthens it. The key is doing so strategically within your established framework. You might add unexpected value to scheduled communications such as market analysis or investment opportunities. You could anticipate questions before they're asked or provide solutions alongside issues. Sometimes it's as simple as acknowledging special occasions in owners' lives.

The best approach is exceeding expectations within your consistency framework, not outside it. An unexpected market analysis added to your regular monthly report builds more trust than a brilliant but random update sent at an unpredictable time.

When communication failures occur, rebuilding trust requires not just returning to baseline expectations but significantly exceeding them for a sustained period. Recovery is possible through acknowledged responsibility without excuses, transparent explanation of exactly how the failure occurred, detailed description of new systems implemented to prevent recurrence, and temporary increase in communication frequency and detail.

As trust builds through consistent communication, owners naturally grant greater operational authority. They feel confident that they'll be informed about significant developments according to schedule, that emergency situations will be communicated immediately, that their investment is being monitored according to agreed-upon parameters, and that they won't face unpleasant surprises.

THE PATH TO OPERATIONAL FREEDOM

The case of the delayed code violation notice represents the ultimate cautionary tale in property management communication. It demonstrates that operational freedom isn't just earned through consistent communication but maintained through systems that make catastrophic failures impossible.

This July, as you work toward greater independence in your property management operations, remember that freedom to operate without constant oversight is built on communication systems so reliable that owners never have to worry about what they're not being told.

Create those systems, honor your communication commitments unfailingly, and watch as owner confidence transforms into the operational autonomy that allows you to do your best work.

Build a property management business Warren Buffett would buy, Part 2

Editor's note: The following article is the second in a two-part series that explores the attributes that are the "secret" to billionaire businessman Warren Buffett's success. Part 1 appeared in June's issue and covered business and owner attributes.

EMPLOYEE ATTRIBUTES

"When you're associating with the people you love, doing what you love, it doesn't get better than that." I like the word "convivial" to describe a pleasant workplace and company culture. One definition is "friendly, lively and enjoyable." I never want to pull up to my main office and hesitate to enter because it is boring, unpleasant and there is tension. Create a company culture where, even though we try to make a good living doing what many others refuse to do, it is almost a fun place their assigned tasks, and they decide how best to accomplish those tasks. They may make mistakes, that is human nature, but you need to be aware of this bad news immediately.

"Having first-rate people on the team is more important than designing hierarchies and clarifying who report to whom." Here is what I have learned: "A" players are more expensive, and more difficult to find, but they demand superior work from themselves, those they manage, and more importantly, you. "B" players may initially cost you less, but they may do irreparable harm to your business. Your staff make or break your company. You cannot tolerate mediocrity. Your top people won't tolerate mediocrity and force you to raise the bar of competency in your company.

"A" players demand "A" work of their direct

In numerous studies, the most fulfilled employees have both autonomy and control. Autonomy means allowing your staff to act independently and making decisions that are aligned with your company's goals and vision.

to work. Allow your team members to express themselves and give them an opportunity to grow, both personally and professionally.

"I tell everybody who works for our company to do only two things to be successful. They are (1) think like an owner and (2) tell us bad news right away. There is no reason to worry about good news." In numerous studies, the most fulfilled employees have both autonomy and control. Autonomy means allowing your staff to act independently and making decisions that are aligned with your company's goals and vision. A team member in control of their work is like an owner of a company who owns every decision. This ownership leads to greater job satisfaction, greater longevity, and improved productivity. You trust them to fulfill reports and may challenge your decisions. That is good. They also require a vision from you so they can align their decision making with your goals. This forces you to set big goals that need bold action and align all the collaborators in your company. It is best to have a powerful story you are telling to get them to believe in you and your mission.

Also, it is best to have a "villain." For us, that is a self-managing owner or, in association management, the huge companies that are indifferent to providing adequate customer service.

Define the guard rails on their decision making and let them act and iterate. One caveat. Every time you hire this level of employee, even after extensive vetting, after 30 days, ask yourself this question, "Knowing what I know today, would I hire this person?" If the answer is "no," terminate their employment the next day. You have high expectations and are paying for expertise; if they don't meet either, you need to find another "A" player.

COMPANY ATTRIBUTES

"You only find out who is swimming naked when the tide goes out." Using debt to grow your company is tempting. With the stroke of a pen after the approval of your bank, you are handed a pile of cash. Better yet, the interest you pay on that loan can be written off. If you borrow $100,000 at 7%, the net cost is about 4%. If you can grow your company organically or through an acquisition and not just service this debt, but get a sufficient return, it can boost both gross revenue and profits.

When the tide is high, the economy is booming and your clients are indifferent to the fees you are charging, all seems good. But if the tide goes out, tenants stop paying rents, owners decide to self-manage or laws are passed that deprive you of former revenue streams, that debt must be paid first. The debt that acted as fuel for growth may become a weight dragging the company down. Always calculate the worst-case scenario before using debt.

"Time is the friend of a wonderful company, the enemy of the mediocre." It is difficult to grow your business without delivering and documenting superior customer service. In property management, do we provide elevated experiences to our clients, particularly our owners? Or do we call them with maintenance or tenant issues, or only contact them when you have changed their pricing and modified their contract? Do we typically communicate bad news and take the business relationship for granted?

Increasingly, as property values soar, an investment property real estate asset that was a small part of their investment portfolio and net worth, is now a very valuable asset and it is our job to better protect that asset. We need to clearly communicate the value of our management services. If you elevate the property management experience for your owners, communicative to them effectively. Have semi-annual zoom calls with your owners, email and mail an annual Net Promoter Score (NPS) survey, and have your managers make a personal call to your owners annually. Build success upon success and share them with the market.

"We enjoy the process far more than the proceeds." We are an industry that has embraced the use of thorough processes and sturdy systems. Whether it is the use of remote team members thousands of miles from our office locations or making sure we do what we say we will do in our agreements when we said we would do them, good processes will lead to positive economic proceeds.

Fortunately, there are consultants and thirdparty vendors who will assist with your design and implementation of your processes. You will never be "done" with this aspect of your business as laws change or improvements are made to your systems.

> If used properly, these processes allow you to work on the business and not iust in it.

"The definition of a great company is one that will be great for 25 or 30 years." Castles were built to last decades. They spent an inordinate amount of time on this task and great effort was expended to achieve this goal. You should use these attributes to do the same: Build a great company that lasts 20 or 30 years or more. Every day you improve that business and care about every aspect of it. You elevate the experience of your owners and tenants and better protect their valuable real estate asset. With sustainable growth with nominal debt, you inexorably grow your revenue and profits.

In your castle are energized employees aligned with your vision and goals. With a large business moat, you are impervious to any threats. You get to put your personal stamp on your business, brand and company. It reflects you. When I used to interview for a new position, I would tell the candidate that this business, this place, this company is my meaning of life. It will be my legacy when I pass. This is not a job for me, but a calling. It is my mission to set a higher standard of excellence, and I expected the same of them. I hope you feel the same way. Follow the wisdom of Warren Buffett and build a property management business he would want to buy.

Increasingly, as property values soar, an investment property real estate asset that was a small part of their investment portfolio and net worth, is now a very valuable asset and it is our job to better protect that asset.
